Tokyo's old fish market area to be redeveloped

Tokyo's old Tsukiji fish market area will be redeveloped into a modern space with a waterfront stadium, skyscrapers, offices, shops, and restaurants. The market, famous for its tuna auctions and fresh sushi, was demolished six years ago. Mitsui Fudosan, the property developer, plans to spend 900 billion yen ($5.7 billion) on this project, aiming to attract both local and international visitors. They hope the new development will compete with top waterfront areas in cities like Sydney and Singapore.

Some people in Tokyo oppose the redevelopment, preferring a garden instead. They are concerned about pollution and the safety of the area during earthquakes. The new plan includes a stadium for the Yomiuri Giants baseball team, a biotechnology research center, and many places to shop and eat. The old market's outer area, with its sushi and ice cream stalls, will remain unchanged.

The empty lot was used for parking during the Tokyo Olympics and will now be transformed into a vibrant urban space. Construction is set to begin next year. City officials promise to consider public feedback before finalizing the plans.
